INVESTIGATIVE CASE FILES OF THE BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION
1908-1922

On the 955 rolls of this microfilm publication are reproduced investigative reports, correspondence, memorandums, and other documents compiled by the Bureau of Investigation, 1908-22. Some records date as late as 1924. This publication also includes an index to the records.

BACKGROUND

Before the establishment of the Department of Justice in 1871, investigations of crimes against the United States were undertaken by U.S. marshals and district attorneys, acting under the direction of the Attorney General. In 1871 Congress began to appropriate annual sums for use by the Attorney General to detect and prosecute such crimes; this fund became the basis of the Department of Justice's central investigative function.

However, in 1871 Congress did not provide for the hiring of investigators for the Department of Justice; the then Attorney General Amos T. Akerman had to request the Treasury Department to direct reliable agents from the U.S. Secret Service to check violations of the Enforcement Acts in the South. In 1875, Attorney General George H. Williams did find the authority to appoint special detectives for the New England, Middle Atlantic, Middle West, and Southern states; after that the Department occasionally appointed agents or special agents. Some years later Attorney General Benjamin H. Brewster used the Pinkerton Detective Agency for investigative work. After Congress ended this practice in 1892, the Department of Justice began to discreetly use Department of Interior agents for investigations, as well as customhouse inspectors, Secret Service agents, and bank examiners from the Department of the Treasury.

Meanwhile, beginning in 1878, the Department had employed examiners to investigate the records and accounts of judicial officers: clerks of the court, marshals, commissioners, and district attorneys. Along with a special agent for Indian affairs, the examiners were under the supervision of a General Agent; however, the General Agent evolved to become a budget and accounting officer. In 1905 the Department originated a new national investigative force by reorganizing the examiners, again under the direction of a General Agent. In 1907 Congress appropriated funds for collecting, classifying, and preserving criminal identification records and exchanging them with State law enforcement officials. Also in 1907 Attorney General Charles J. Bonaparte vested in the Chief Examiner of the Department of Justice responsibility for the detection of crimes against the Federal Government; on July 26, 1908, he ordered that all requests for investigations were to be referred to the Chief Examiner. Soon after President Taft's inauguration, Attorney General George W. Wickersham formally created the Bureau of Investigation with the Chief Examiner serving as Bureau Chief.

The Bureau was expanded considerably in 1910, when it assisted in the enforcement of the White Slave Traffic (Mann) Act, and during the World War I period, when it was responsible for apprehending enemy aliens and enforcing the new conscription act. The Bureau also participated in the suppression of radical activities after the war. In 1921 Attorney General Harry H. Daugherty appointed William J. Burns Chief of the Bureau as part of a re-organization of the agency. In 1923 the functions of the Bureau of Criminal Identification, which had operated under the Superintendent of Prisons as a clearinghouse for the exchange of records of criminals, were transferred to the Bureau of Investigation. There was another reorganization in 1924 and John Edgar Hoover was appointed Chief of the Bureau. In 1935 the Bureau of Investigation became the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

RECORDS DESCRIPTION

The records reproduced in this microfilm publication are divided into five series consisting of four series of investigative case files and an index to the four files. The FBI microfilmed the case files and the first 103 rolls of index cards in 1951-52 and subsequently microfilmed 8 additional rolls of index cards. In 1976 the National Archives and Records Service accessioned the microfilm produced by the FBI. The five series can be described as follows:

1. Index to Investigative Case Files, 1908-22. The index rolls are arranged alphabetically by name of person or organization investigated. Each name is followed by the appropriate file designator and number (e.g., Misc. 1; OG 1; Mex. 232 General Sec. 1; BuSec. 4-1-3 Sub. 14).

2. General Investigative Records ("Miscellaneous Files"), 1908-22. This series is arranged by file number. The file number order corresponds to the date on which the investigations were initiated. The records contain investigative reports, correspondence, and memorandums dealing with alleged violations of Federal laws. These files were created under the first classification system used by the Bureau of Investigation, which was introduced in 1908.

3. Investigative Records Relating to German Aliens ("Old German Files"), 1915-20. These records are arranged numerically, 1 through 391,901. They constituted File 8000, the original "Miscellaneous Files" designation for investigations of German aliens; however, the 8000 File was later separated because of its size. The records include reports, memorandums, and other documents relating to investigations of German aliens, who were politically suspect at the time.

4. Investigative Records Relating to Mexican Neutrality Violations ("Mexican Files"), 1909-21. These "232" files are arranged numerically, 232-1 through 232-6049. File 232 began as a part of the "Miscellaneous Files," covering the first investigations of conditions on the Mexican border in 1916, when General John J. Pershing first led a U.S. army into Mexico. The file became so large that it was established as a separate series. The records include reports, memorandums, and other documents relating to investigations of persons believed to be operating against U.S. interests during the Mexican civil wars. This material includes much information relating to political, social, and economic conditions in the U.S.-Mexican border area at the time.

5. Investigative Records Transferred from the Department of Justice ("Bureau Section Files"), 1920-21. These records are arranged in two consecutive groups, the first by number assigned to the type of violation and thereunder serially, 4-1-3 through 60-126-9, and the second numerically, 6,615 through 313,846, with many gaps. The records consist of investigative reports and correspondence culled from other areas of the Department of Justice whose investigative functions had been absorbed by the Bureau of Investigation. Many of the files are duplicated in the "Miscellaneous Files." These records were transferred from the Department of Justice to the Bureau of Investigation on October 5, 1921.
